FORBES'* 2008 INTERNATIONAL INVESTING GUIDE: FOREIGN COUNTRIES BENEFITING FROM ECONOMIC REFORMS

New York, NY (July 2, 2008) — Rising commodity prices, frail banks, inflation and a slowing U.S. economy are taking a toll on global markets. However, since mid-2003, stocks in countries like Brazil, China, India, Mexico and Russia have done particularly well. The Forbes 2008 International Investing Guide (p. 77) reveals prospects for investing in foreign markets that have benefited from rising prices for their natural resources, growing export markets and the rapid rise of consumer markets within their own borders. From technology in Taipei to the banking industry in Europe, Forbes uncovers new investment opportunities abroad that will help to send foreign portfolios soaring. RELATED STORIES:

BUY ON WEAKNESS (p. 78) The value stocks favored by Tweedy, Browne haven't done very well lately, but believers in value will have all the more reason to be buying those stocks now.

DIE FAMILIE FIRMA (p. 94) – Warren Buffett has discovered Europe's Mittelstand -- midsize, family-owned businesses. Here's a way to play the same game.

REBUILDING CHINA (p. 100) – When investing in the Chinese market, go for one of the least glamorous sectors. Cement, for example.

INTO AFRICA (p. 106) – Despite the continent's turbulent politics, one intrepid investor sees numerous value opportunities.

OTHER STORIES:

DARK JOURNALISM (p. 38) – Censorship isn't the only thing wrong with Chinese reporting. In China's world of "black journalism," tragedies get swept under the rug by dirty reporters in return for hush money.

THE OTHER REAL ESTATE DISASTER (p. 64) – Your state's employee pension fund is probably (a) doing badly with recent real estate pools and (b) working very hard with the private equity operators of these pools to keep you in the dark.

HERE COME THE FEATURETISEMENTS (p. 50) – David Koretz says he can double Facebook's revenues. First he has to prove he can do more than that with his own startup.
